You’ve probably heard the saying, “It’s better to give than to receive.” Well, research shows that it’s actually true. Studies show that people who regularly help those around them, without expecting anything in return, are generally healthier than those who don’t.

Habitual helping leads to:

- Reduced stress, anxiety and depression
- An improved sense of purpose
- Better self-esteem
- A sense of belonging